THE PATRIOTS

The Story of Lee and the Lost Hope

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

The story opens in the trying days of al, when the North and South were arrayed in deadly conflict and family the were torn assunder over the grave questions which split the nation in twain. While at Harvard Philip Grafton, a young Virginnan, becomes the attanced husband of Kathleen Kirkwood, whose sympathles are all with the North. When Grafton announces his intention to hear arms for the Confederacy a stormy scene ensues, and results in Philip being sent away with no hope of ever claiming the Northern girl as his bride.

Heavy hearted, Philip goes back to Virginia and enlists in an infantry regiment, with a secret hope that there, perhaps, he may soon find successe for his sortow in a speedy builter from the ensule's guns. Before joining his regiment Philip visite his old home and finds his guardian, Judge Lewis, in a deplorable state of bealth. The Judge has a bad attack, and believing that he is about to die, gives his granddaughter Ariadne into Philip's care, with the request that he become her husband.

"Harrington, madam," returned the young man, "William Harrington, of the Second Maine Cavalry."
"My name is Grafton. I do not be staring, as a sudden idea struck him. What was one of General Lee's staff officers doing there? Then his lips spoke his thought. Grafton readily an-

"I came here to see my wife."

"Umph!" said the other, suspiciously;
"you don't happen to have a stray dispatch about you?"

"I have not," said Grafton, and he thanked God Lee had not reduced his orders to writing.

"No communication of any kind?" asked Harrington.

"No communication of any kind about me," returned Grafton coolly.

"You will pardon me, I am sure," said Harrington politely, "but I must be certain. You will not object to being searched?"

"Search my husband" cried Arladne.
"Captain Harrington means no indig."
"And if you can, sir, laughed Harrington was the captain Harrington means no indig."
"And if you can, sir, laughed Harrington means no indig." "I came here to see my wife."
"Umph!" said the other, suspiciously;

"Captain Harrington means no indig-ity, my dear," said Grafton, cheer-fully, "Cerainly, Captain, you can

"God forbid." said the officer, "but it is possible that he might have passed anything he carried to you."

"He did not," answered the young woman. "I give you my word of honor that he did not."

"Weil, it is not very military," said Capt. Harrington, greatly relieved, "but I accept your assurance. Now for the coffee."

If Cart. Harrington had nursued but I care the coal of not accomplish with that profound assurance in her son. He keed her. He cared nothing for that Northern woman. He had said the most beautiful woman his eyes had ever looked upon. Well, there would be time enough to dwell upon this later. The instant the cavalry disappeared down the road she turned to Aza.

offee If Capt. Harrington had pursued his investigations further he would have trapped the two. While Grafton might have lied and lied successfully, to conceal the fact that he had been charged with a verhal message, which he had turned over to his wife, in view of the tremendous gravity of the situation, the fact that the fate of Lee's army and the Confederacy practically hung upon the outcome of the conversation, and while Ariadne might have seconded such an assertion, it was morally conded such an assertion and conded such an assertion a trapped the two. While Grafton might have fled and fled successfully, to conceal the fact that he had been charged with a verhal message, which he had turned over to his wife, in view of the tremendous gravity of the situation, and while Aradon might have been unable to sustain a cross-canded such an assertion, it was morally certain her invincible honeaxy would have been unable to sustain a cross-examination upon that point. It was with a feeling of great relief, therefore that they heard that inquisition term into the hadance and her husband and Harring ton on the patch, the soldiers out on the grant and her husband and Harring ton on the patch, the soldiers out on the grant and her husband and Harring ton on the patch, the soldiers out on the grant many case. "Will you say good-bye-to your wife, Captain Grafton? We must be moving immediately."

There was no such thing as privacy or secrecy now. The yard was full of soldiers in line. All that Grarton could do would have to be done before the public. He stepper closer to her, and, although she put out her hand to stop him—for Arladne had prepared for the contingency of their meeting and had made certain plans which, unfortunately for her, she could not carry out under these circumstances—he drew her to him, kissed her passionately and whispered. "You won't fail?" He heard her reply, "Trust me," and turned resolutely away.

"And if you can, sir, laughed Harrington. "I'm sorry to take your husband away, but —" He straightened up, clapped his hat on his head. "Right forward, four right!" he cried. "Trot! March."

no doubt about it. Her heart sang, her pulses throbbed as she rode swiftly over the winding path, And there was sweetness almost be-yond understanding in the fact that she was now doing something for him. Not only did he love her, but he was depending upon her. She was necesdepending upon her. She was necessary to him. Not merely necessary to his happiness, but to his honor-perhaps to his very life. She was riding for him and for the cause that, next to him, she loved above everything else. Although every moment put distance between them, and she felt that she never wished to be parted from him again, she rode, the happiest girl in the Southern Confederacy.

The road was a very crooked one, simply a tenuous line through the wilderness, of which there were many to derness, of which there were many to bring scattered clearings in touch with the great highways. It zigzagged through the woods in the most erratic fashion, to take in every wayside hut that desired connection with the main traveled roads. Little branch paths just wide enough for a wagon to pass through meandered off at intervals, ending nowhere.

Ariadne had often traveled this road "Right forward, four right!" he cried.

"Toot." March."

"Because you have it so carefully hidden?"

"Because there is nothing to find."

"Look here," said the Union officer, "will yoo give me your word of honor as an officer and a gentleman that you have no papers or written orders of any have no papers or written orders of any description about you?"

"Cheerfully!" returned Grafton, glad to be able to give the required assurance. "Upon my word of honor, as an officer and a gentleman, I have no wiften orders of any kind upon my person in any shape or form, nor have I had any for several days."

"And you, madam, have you any?"

"None," answered Ariadne. "Would they turn to the south? She was greatly relieved when she saw the head to the column swing into the road and turn to the south. Another time she was more and more absorbed and other objects in view. She must ride to save her confederately to save the honor of her husband, who had periled all three to save her. How splendic he had been as he dashed up? She had known him instantly he had stepped on the porchand had often traveled this road. Former Congressman Charged With Shooting

Charged with shooting a deputy sheriff who placed him under arrest for ine-riety, former Congressman Edgar Wilson of Illinois is in custody at Boise City today. His victim is not seriously injured. Friends of the former member from Idaho who witnessed the shooting declare that Wilson shot the deputy in attempting to fire a buflet into his own brain.

Wilson represented Idaho here from 1886 to 1888. He was associate counsel for the defense in the trials of Haywood, Moyer, and Pettibone in 1907, following the assassination of Governor Steunenberg, of Idaho.

Harry Champlin is the deputy sheriff shot by Wilson. The shooting occurred in the sheriff's office.
